

healthier than centralized local bodies to the village people. The structure of decentralized government in India and Bangladesh gives a comparative look as Indian Local Self-Government is a third stratum government followed by Central and State Governments. On the other hand, rural Local bodies of Bangladesh are a second stratum structure followed by central authority. As there is no state culture, the Local Self-Government of Bangladesh starts from district hierarchy. Total 64 districts are works under the control of Central Governments. Similarly intermediate and village panchayats are running under the chairmanship of district panchayat. As a resident of under developed country, the people of Bangladesh need a wide intervention of rural local bodies towards their life and livelihood. Article 59 and 60 briefly tells about the Local Self-Government in Bangladesh, while a special amendment has been constituted to strengthen the rural local bodies in India which indicates the importance of decentralization of Local Self-Government in particular country.
